FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON FULL OF DETERMINATION

New Governor General of Philippines Is Calm, But Believes in Getting Results.

One of these days Francis Burton Harrison, newly-appointed governor general of the Philippines, will reach those sunny isles. Whereupon it may be that strangers to F. B. Harrison, mistaking that gentleman's invariable courtesy for a temperamental blanch, will try to bite him in the ear.

It's a pity we won't all be there to see it. Because a deadly calm will settle over those isles before the sound bite is taken. It will be Mr. Harrison's calm. He never travels without it. Now and then he develops a calm temper, which is contradiction in terms but not in fact. For a person who perhaps never soiled a glove or wilted a collar in his life he can be as numerously efficient during a period of unrest as any man in politics.

Efficiency, Keynote.

Efficiency is the Harrison keynote—plus calm. It isn't likely that he ever made a real joke in his life. He looks one straight in the eye. He shakes hands as though he meant it. He answers questions by candid "yes" or "no"—unless he declines to answer at all. He works at his desk at night until the day's work is done—and gets back at the desk by 9 o'clock the next morning. At vacation time he likes to go into the woods and methodically pursue the particular bear which he has fixed upon for his quarry until the hunted creature comes into camp and gives himself up. That was the way he got into politics. In 1902 he was in California, when a well meaning cousin wired him:

"Come back to New York," said the well meaning cousin. "You can have the democratic nomination for Congress in the thirteenth district.

Youngest Member of House.

That gift would have pleased a regular politician just as much as Dutch measles. The old thirteenth district was almost completely republican. Residents who did not dress for dinner would have white-washed for a living if New York had any picket fences. But Harrison shook hands and talked and blushed a shy, efficient, continuous blush day and night through the district until at twenty-nine he became the youngest member of the House. Two years later the Roosevelt wave swamped his candidacy for lieutenant governor.

"Will this defeat keep you out of politics?" he was asked.

"I may be kept out of office," said Mr. Harrison, in his well modulated Yale-bred voice. "But I cannot be kept out of politics."

His social position is that of a Brahmin. He is very wealthy; he belongs to innumerable clubs; his father was Jefferson Davis' private secretary, and his mother was Constance Cary Harrison, well known as a writer of clever fiction.

Free Trade Advocate.

In New York he is a Tammany asset, and in Washington he is, perhaps, the ablest advocate of free trade in the House. He ranks second to Oscar W. Underwood on the ways and means committee. Harrison is extraordinarily well liked on both sides, not only because he is clean and fair, but because he is such a beautifully fair and free fighter.

And a word of advice to the patriots of the Philippines: You may have assumed from Mr. Harrison's speeches that he wants to take the hoolies off you just as soon as possible, but do not try to take those hoolies off yourself, because Harrison has the jaw and the eye of a man who can, will, and likes to run things—in a calm way, of course.

missed this point almost entirely and their articles for popular reading have been too largely devoted to lamentations of the inadequacy of present provision and doubts of the character of the assistance to be furnished from persons who turn successful civilian activities into military channels.

The history of the volunteers in the wars of the United States seems to show that the real weakness of these troops after they have become accustomed to field conditions is the inability of their officers to carry out what are known in base ball as "bone-head plays."

Might Have Been Avoided.

Exhibitions of solid ivory have been given, sometimes by officers of high rank, which might have been checked or avoided if a general idea of how soldiers ought to work had been current.

Future commanding generals who are now West Point students have an opportunity which their predecessors have neglected. If modern means of publicity are made the instruments of instruction by professional soldiers as other professions instruct their clientele, the lawyer in the field that he promises to be today, costly of lives and property in the undesirable event of war.

WORK FOR NAVY YARD

Additional Allotment of $69,250 Will Keep Present Force Employed.

Acting Secretary Roosevelt has announced that the sum of $69,250 has been allotted to the Washington navy yard, in addition to the regular appropriations for the current fiscal year.

The navy yard is engaged in the manufacture of firing locks and heads for torpedoes, breech mechanisms for drill guns and subcaliber attachments.

That action was taken, Mr. Roosevelt said, in order to avert the necessity for further reductions in the work force at the yard, which otherwise would have been inevitable in consequence of the lack of work in the production of guns and ordnance material.

It is calculated that the extra work will keep the present force of the yard employed throughout the remainder of the year. An effort will be made for more liberal appropriations for naval construction next year. If that is successful the Washington navy yard will be kept going on full time, and possibly with its increased force of workmen.

D. C. SCHOOL TUITION CAUSE OF COMPLAINT

Congress Alleged to Have Discriminated in Its Treatment of Non-Residents.

The recent announcement of an increase of the tuition rates for certain non-resident children in the District of Columbia schools serves to call attention again to the extraordinary character of the school legislation enacted by a democratic Congress in connection with the District appropriation act of June 25, 1912.

The objectionable character of the legislation in question rests not in its doctrine that the District of Columbia schools are in general for the free use of residents of the District only, nor yet alone in the radical change made in a long-settled governmental policy without notice or warning or opportunity afforded the communities chiefly affected properly to prepare for the assumption of duties the District and the general government jointly had long assumed under the laws of Congress.

Object to Discrimination.

The grossly discriminating exceptions introduced into the new law constitute the chief ground of condemnation, because the common result of these discriminations is to deprive the affected communities of the co-operation and support of the majority of their people in the building up and improvement of local schools.

The "non-resident" government employee who is public-spirited and far-sighted enough to join with his less favored neighbors in the solving of the local school question is the exception, and even though he be a citizen of one of the States, he is usually without minor children or are patrons of private schools. It is the "non-resident" business and professional men of Washington, both employers and employees, and many of them taxpayers in the District as well as at home, who had bearing the burden of the burden of the situation created by a democratic Congress, which legislatively discriminates in favor of the official and wealthy classes against the non-official and poorer classes when it comes to bestowing free educational privileges on technically "non-resident" factors in the public and private business of the capital.

Should Correct Injustice.

Congress owes it not only to the District, but to the "non-resident" communities to put the District of Columbia schools on an undiscriminating tuition basis as regards "non-residents" of all classes, regardless of official position or of amount of wealth and the taxes paid thereon to the District.

Only by this means will strict justice be done and agitation ended, and the "non-resident" communities enabled to work out their several local problems and attain the degree of educational independence they should have, and ought to have had years ago, and would have had but for the former policy of Congress, which fostered the belief that the District is peculiarly national territory, common ground for all the people.

JEWEL THIEVES ESCAPE

Kill Two Clerks and Probably Fatally Wound Another in Grand Rapids, Mich.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., September 19.—A corps of outside detectives arrived here today to assist the local police department in its efforts to capture the robbers who late yesterday afternoon held up three clerks in the John N. Thomson jewelry store here, killed two of them, perhaps fatally injured the third and escaped with about $2,000 worth of jewelry.

Although the robbers did not, as was supposed last night long enough to give the officers a description of the robbers, the police this morning had failed to get any definite clues as to their whereabouts. Several suspects were taken into custody and later released.

Thomson and Smith Killed.

The victims of the shooting were John N. Thomson and Edward Smith, who were killed, and Paul Townsend, the watchmaker, who is still alive, but in a precarious condition. After the shooting the robbers stopped only a couple of minutes to gather up a few diamonds and watches, and then escaped in the crowded streets.

The two robbers with drawn revolvers entered the jewelry store, commanded the clerks to throw up their hands, and when they refused opened fire.

The three victims were alone in the store when the robbers entered. Townsend, who was taken to a local hospital, was able to tell only a few words concerning the robbery.

In Heart of Business Section.

The jewelry store is almost in the heart of the business district, and pedestrians passed while the robbers were within. One person informed the police that he heard three shots fired. Policemen nearby also were attracted by the shooting, but the robbers fled before they arrived.

After Thomson fell mortally wounded, one of the robbers snatched from his finger a diamond ring, while the second robber placed the contents of several trays of diamonds in his pockets and ransacked the cash register.
